What is don't count your planets crack the egg?

A mysterious if underwhelming event. Stellaris is home to plenty of strange events with mysterious options that leave the player puzzled about what to choose. Don't Count Your Planets: Crack the Egg event is no exception, but no worries, we're here to explain the event and what each option leads to.

What is stellaris don't count your planets?

Stellaris Don't Count Your Planets event has been added in Leviatan Stellaris DLC and is triggered by a discovery of a level 3 anomaly called Strange Mountain Formation. Basically, your scientists saw that the mountain range doesn't seem natural and once you explore it, the event will be triggered.

Do you count your planets if your scientist dies?

New comments cannot be posted and votes cannot be cast. No, don't count your planets is just a low chance to kill your scientist, and high chance it's just a dead, mushy egg. If your scientist dies nothing is created for you to attack. Don't count your planets gives a ton of society research you should almost always take the risk and study it.

It is likely that moons will count towards that 1000+ figure. As for Jupiter, we have seen the layout for the Sol system, and Jupiter is shown as having 4 moons, while Saturn has 7 and Uranus has 5. Those aren't real world counts, but they are what Starfield has chosen to include.

The location of planets within your empire, and their distribution, has ZERO bearing on ethics, factions, resource shortages or excesses, capacity to produce things. The galaxy map is meaningless when it comes to these things. Planets are also just modelled poorly. I don't really like the whole districts/buildings model. (that is subjective, i ...

So, these are stars that don't have a lot of iron. They don't have a lot of carbon. They don't have a lot of heavy elements in them. These kinds of devoid-of-heavy-element stars appear to still be devoid of planets. So, that part of our original understanding was true. If you don't have the stuff to make planets, you do not make planets.

With so much of Stellaris focusing on exploring the cosmos, expanding territory, building up stations and fleets, it can be easy to forget about the planets in which the vast majority of your populations inhabit. Planetary colonies are, without a doubt, one of the most important aspects of an empire's economy and infrastructure, essentially acting as the foundation from ...

Hi. So ive been playing for a good time now with my current main save file. I've built a Habitat, colonized it, but then that was it. At first i just continued like it was nothing. Then I started looking at my 8 Core planets and see that I also have my Habitat section with said colonized Habitat. But again I already have

Systems that have settled planets within them have the empire's logo on the left of the system name, opposite the starbase icon. Not if you've taken the system with a navy vessel. Then it's just your icon whether there's planets or not, so if you don't have transport fleets, it becomes harder to search for planets you haven't yet invaded.

Medium planets are in the middle, and probably more realistic as your resource planets over time, though the planetary capacity may trade a few resource districts for urban. That's fine, and these make decent planets. All large and medium planets will want some urban building slots, though. An amenities building, a pop assembly building, the ...
